Not illustrated. 1772 Excerpt: ... the dark, that he was obliged to have candles burning in his chamber all night, to avoid the distress of it. Worn down, at length, in body and mind, with these accumulated evils, and not meeting with even an alleviation of his distress, from the many nervous and other medicines which he had tried, he went to Bath, where he was greatly relieved by an ingenious Physician. He often after that, had recourse to those salutary waters; but from the first time he used them, he had short fits of the Gout every year, sometimes in the feet, sometimes in the hands; and as those fits were more or less complete, he was more or less relieved by them, and continued well a longer or shorter time after them. In the spring 1766, he had a fit of the Gout, which going off too soon, left him as bad with the lowness of spirits, pains in the head, giddiness, &c. as he had ever been. Upon this, he was advised to go to Buxton, in hopes the waters there would give him a more complete fit; which he accordingly did; but after drinking them a few days, he was seized with so violent an attack of the Gout in his stomach and bowels, that, for ten hours, it was not expected he could survive it. And when this attack went off, he had an extreme soreness over his whole body, as if, according to his own expression, he had been staid alive. It was so great, that for three days he could scarcely bear to be taken out of bed. This fit, however, was of great service to him, for he continued perfectly well some months after it. But his health declining again, he went to Bath in the Winter, and passed some months there; during which, he grew better, but had not got rid of his old complaints, when he was obliged to come to London in April 1767, where he fell into a slight sit; and, on fin...
